Southern Africa Systems

For many years, scientists interested in understanding the Earth's environment thought the best way was to study the parts. So our knowledge accumulated on the geology, hydrology, biology, meteorology and oceanography, but little understanding of the whole system of Earth resulted. A few scientists thought that the best way to understand the whole Earth was not from the perspective of the individual sciences, but from a larger perspective, a systems science.

This book is an introduction to systems science. It contains chapters on principles, concepts and theories of systems science and the application of that science in southern Africa with the objective of fostering better understanding of humans and their environment. It is about a systems approach to understanding the place of humans in the biosphere, concepts of environmental stewardship instead of ownership, and how to plan for, design for, and generate policies for a good fit between humans and their life-supporting environment for the future. More specifically, it is about changing "business as usual" in light of the game changing issues of global warming, globalization, resource scarcity, over population, etc.
